Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: .The existence of wickedness, and especially the existence of hardened, obstinate, impenitent wickedness, offering no hope of aught but either eternal misery, or else utter annihilation, --this is the problem which the stern presence of dreadful facts around us, and the stern testimony of conscience within us, force upon our attention. How shall we reconcile these with our faith in the divine goodness? My reply is, that any attempt to reconcile them by a mere process of the intellect must fail. The subject is beyond the reach of human reason: it will ever remain among those things for whose solution we must be content to wait. In all departments of human thought, we find things that utterly transcend the measure of our powers. Even in geometry, which is the lowest and simplest of all possible objects of our thought, we have numerous examples of irreconcilable ideas....
