This is a widely recognized principle. The students of such sciences as physics, astronomy and botany have spent a great deal of time and effort in selecting and defining most minutely the terms necessary to their descriptions and discussions. And whether it be cause or effect, the present undeniable crudity of horticultural nomenclature is evidence that pomology, vegetable culture and floriculture still fall measurably short of being sciences. Science is said to be classified knowledge; but before we can classify our knowledge of horticultural varieties, we must have those varieties unequivocally named and accurately described. We are fond of saying that horticulture is coming to be a science; but it certainly falls far short, in this respect, of what it ought to be. A reasonable nomenclature assigns to each entity, be it object, process, species or variety, a separate and...
