This item is printed on demand - Print on Demand Neuware - Seminar paper from the year 2011 in the subject Business economics - Accounting and Taxes, grade: 1, Stockholm School of Economics (Accounting Faculty), language: English, abstract: Diverging views on the attribute of 'comparability. for financial reporting under IFRS Six guest lectures at Stockholm School of Economics passed by and one word left a permanent mark on my mind. With a high regularity and consensus the representatives of different interest groups involved in financial reporting mentioned 'comparability., sometimes referred to as 'consistency. or 'continuity., as one particularly important attribute of good financial reporting. Heurlin (2011, p. 8/12), as an IASB member, stressed the need to acknowledge consistency in financial reporting, which he regards as a proxy for good financial reporting. Scheja (2011), in his auditor role, stated that PwC has a major focus in auditing on ensuring comparability of financial reporting, i.e. by preventing the usage of non-GAAP measures for earnings management. According to him, the attribute of relevance is mainly ensured by preparers. Also, Gerentz (2011) mentioned the term comparability twice; first, stating that NCC aims at preventing managerial opportunism in IR, and second, stressing the need for NCC to create peer comparability by educating analysts about their own 'more correct IFRS interpretation'. Last, Malmqvist (2011), representing analysts, pointed out the importance that firms enable peer comparability, i.e. by providing comparable income statements without company-specific non-GAAP measures, where irregularities are explained in footnotes, and by using more comparable accounting methods. So, on this point: All united As opposed to the otherwise often diverging opinions, all interest groups¹ strikingly seem to be aligned that comparability constitutes good financial reporting. But do the involved interest groups really share one...
