Path diagram. energy induced separation network not only incorporates these heat-transfer type unit operations, but also involves the use of pressurization and depressurization techniques to enhance the thermodynamics of the separation. The final technique discussed by Dr. Dunn was the waste interception and allocation network which is based on the concept that it is cheaper to perform separations in the heart of a process. When pollutants are formed early it is more prudent to perform a separation within the heart of the plant, so by the time the streams reach the end of the pipe they are already environmentally acceptable. Along the same lines, using energy separators and or pressurization techniques within the heart of the plant can also yield the same kind of effects and there are numerous case studies to illustrate the cost-effectiveness of these technologies. In conclusion, there are a series of existing process integration tools that...
